Opt-Outs - timanglade ====== timanglade Slightly OT, this post is about a new site we're launching today (colevinka.com) where you can opt out of social media stuff from other people that you're following, much like e.g. DuckDuckGo always shows a "no trackers" page in their web results. Except on this site you can also opt out of any site or service you dislike by just letting them know: "I'm not a fan of this company, hence I don't want to follow and/or be contacted by them". The idea basically came to me on a free day spent in a waiting room at the doctor a few days ago (it's a pretty normal experience, mind). It's a weird idea to be honest, but I'm pretty excited about it. The credit crunch is creating a huge headache for the country's biggest estate agents. Unlike other companies, they will have to reveal their full financial position to the Bank of England before they can qualify to seek a Bank of England debt-finance facility. This week, the agents' regulator the Estate Agents' Council received the first of several letters from the bank laying down the terms under which the estate agents will be able to access such an arrangement, and how they will be obliged to repay it. Under the terms of the letters, the estate agents will be expected to show that it is "profitable and sustainable". The council has also been told that the Bank may require its borrowers to prove that a loan is not "unduly attractive" for other lenders. Greg C, who co-founded the Essex-based agency Bexley Homes, which has debts amounting to about £450,000, and a profit margin of 5.2%, told the Guardian: "This would be a disaster for us. It is expected that we need a sizeable amount of the facility for immediate purposes. "At the end of the day, we have a business which needs to be successful to survive. We cannot subsidise our business with the bank's money. There is no way we could do that." The move follows a crackdown on agency and other stock-market firms' use of debt facilities

Mixing patterns within ocean surface circulation. Interactions between the dynamics of ocean surface circulation and mixing are crucial for the organization and mixing of ocean waters. Mixing patterns are important in the transport of oceanic waters to the ocean interior, to the boundary layers and to the shelf seas. This paper focuses on mixing patterns of surface currents in the two parts of the Pacific, the South Pacific and the North Pacific, with special emphasis on regions to the south of New Zealand. Mixing depends on many different properties including the wind field and the terrain of the Pacific. The complex structure of the ocean surface currents in the Pacific is a combination of circulations with eastward movement in the east Pacific, westward movement in the central Pacific and with cross-equatorial currents, in addition to zonal jets and topography. In recent years, the interest in mixing in the Pacific Ocean has increased because of the development of a general circulation model, the Geodetic Model of the South Pacific Ocean, and the GPS mooring network, the Pacific Pathfinder.James Edward Herbert James Edward Herbert (1844–1905) was a Canadian artist and writer who served as the third president of the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts from 1895–1898.
