A real-time active layer library, like Pixologic's ZBrush, would not have been a good fit for Photoshop. It would have taken a long time to make any significant difference; as it is, I've spent a lot of time eking the most out of each feature that I can get. Ultimately, I want to get good quality fast. Simple things like using my magic wand to create thin bevels and polygonal strokes are quick and easy. Unfortunately, I didn't get the hang of it until CS5. Although it's not necessarily a bad thing, the text selection development process appears to have stalled. Adobe may have missed the boat on simple stuff like it losing most of the command line goodness along with anything that adds complexity to the command line. Something as simple as Calendar could have been made 10x better if they spent a lot more time on text selection. I don't know if this is just Adobe marketing being conservative or Adobe just got too busy with other things. I find it quite ironic that the people who are responsible for providing the best free software are the ones who get sued the most for not providing "excusable access" and "copy-protection." Another thing that really hurts me is that Photoshop is actually starting to look and feel even more like its siblings. I can fully understand why they would want to stay in the same vein. But take a look at their online product line and compare it to the current state of GIMP. Even though GIMP does not include as many features as Photoshop, those features are at least organized differently, and this organization makes making the entire user interface more intuitive and simple.
