What's New in the Slider?

This is a small application that allows you to animate between slides based on an input image. The application is very straightforward. You can either use an image from the Windows image list, which is great if you want to create a personalized animation, or drag an input image from your file system directly into the application. The program is easy to use, although it can't automatically determine an image format. There is support for a lot of file types, so just try it out. The interface is quite minimalist. You can either open an existing animation, or create a new one using the default settings. These include a background, movement, duration, and output folder. The animation output can be done in a variety of ways, including animated GIFs. There is no option to create the animation directly on a computer screen, which is a pity. Every setting can be changed, including the output size, output file format, and background color. You can also modify the duration and the start and end movement settings. Overall, the program is quite versatile, so we can easily recommend it.

SlideShowPro is a nifty little application, allowing you to create slide shows using the input image as a template. Although the application is simple to use, it's not as simple as it should be to implement. For instance, there is no way to create animation directly from the application. It requires you to export the images to external apps, such as Windows Movie Maker, for example. Use an image from the Windows image list. If you have an image on your computer, chances are it's in JPEG or PNG format. These are supported, which is a big plus. There is also support for gifs, BMP, TIF, WMF, and PSD, which are supported to some extent. The range of file formats is impressive, although some are barely supported, such as TGA, DIB, and RAW. There is a small preview window, which you can use to adjust the position, appearance, and background of each slide. You can also control the output folder, which is useful to create proper graphics for the output. Apart from this, there is support for parallel output, which means that you can put two different outputs in the same folder. By using this software, you can easily create slide shows with a single click. The application offers a variety of settings, including the number of slides per show, the duration of each slide, the background color, and so on. There is also support for a wide array of file formats, including JPEG, PNG, and WMF. To be honest, the application lacks a lot of polish. At first, the interface didn't seem quite functional. It took some time to figure out how it was supposed to work. Despite this, it's a nice little application. You can add as many slides as you want, and the slides can be put on either axis.
